LAWYER TALK

On its 10th birthday no loss of fizz at the Shopfront Youth Legal Centre

FIER TEN YEARS representing young people with insoluble problems, irremediable dysfunctions and depressing futures, shouldn't solicitor Jane Sanders feel drained, dull, pessimistic, worn out before her time, yearning to slam the doors of the Shopfront Youth Legal Centre shut behind her and enter the cosy cloisters of conveyancing or corporate arbitration?

Sanders, principal solicitor at the Shopfront Youth Legal Centre laughs off any such suggestion. She is no Atlas, waiting to be relieved of a burden that grows more onerous with time.

"You can't imagine how rewarding it is to work with young people and share in their optimism," she tells LSJ.

In fact, the Legal Centre's 10th anniversary celebration at Freehills on 25 February, was just that – a happy celebration by the agency representatives involved in it.

They included the Shopfront contingent of Sanders, her three solicitor colleagues, a paralegal and a legal assistant, and representatives of Mission Australia and the Salvation Army.

Mission Australia joined with Freehills in 1993 to set up the Shopfront Youth Legal Centre as a response to the Burdekin Report on homeless children and the Salvation Army became involved in 1997. Ten years as principal solicitor with the Shopfront Youth Legal Centre has strengthened Jane Sanders (centre) in her commitment to assisting young people navigate the slippery shoals of the law and life beyond it. The Shopfront assists each year more than 500 disadvantaged and homeless people, aged 25 and under with legal support, advice and representation. Responsibilities and costs of operating the and a legal assistant, while the Salvation Army provides youth worker support and the office space, rent-free.

If Sanders finds anything depressing, it's not the young people she deals with, though their problems are often monumental, but the short-term lawand-order view politicians take of criminal justice issues.

"In the real world you'll always get young people needing legal services," she says, "but governments are not taking sufficient account of the other serious difficulties young people struggle with: homelessness, mental illness, sexual assault or substance abuse.

What makes the Shopfront special, according to Sanders, is its being based right in the community - Kings Cross -
